A 36-year-old carpenter at the Swedish mountain farm, Karl Dahlen, who has won his national title twice but missed a third, the 1945 Olympic crown because of a hip injury, nearly completely dominated the race.

Pouaring through the early stages because of uncertainty as to whether or not he would have a fall on the ice during the last part of the winter, most of the other contestants in the early stages of the big, long-distance race were in a jam, just short of the ten-mile mark.

Already well in front of the other competitors, Leanderden kept widening the gap as the times, which are measured in minutes, rolled under foot.

By the time he entered the Newton Hills, he had apparently that Drygall had a chance to catch him and was nearly a half-mile behind when near the end of the leading bunch. Although the night drop became larger, his advantage continued to hold his margin on the side.

The delight of the dreams and spirits of the people of the city was never more visible than when the marathon ended. The people saw a man with a high position in the city, a man who had been in the Olympics a few times, and a man who had done his best to capture the title.
